A most wanting feature in the plan, however, is that no provision is made The health of the community is very for a reduction in the acreage, which must be the foundation of any plan. that will alleviate the trouble.

If five and six cents a pound for cotton is less than the cost of producing it, (which goes undisputed) I claim that we have the grandest opportunity before us that we have ever had; and if we fail to avail ourselves of it, we should suffer worse than ruin. Ine farmers of the South have the privilege now of buying at least a portion of their next year's cotton crop, at a price far less than it will cost to produce it.

A great trouble in getting the acreage reduced is, that we farmers as class are very selfish, and are afraid that if we reduce the acreage sufficiently to guarantee a rise in price, that our neighbor, who had made no reduction, and possibly an increase would be greatly benefited at our expense.

The plan I propose is a simple one, which, if generally adopted, will reduce the acreage to any extent that may seem advisable, and at the same time give to those who adopt it, the benefit of a full acreage.

The plan is this: Let a mass meeting of the farmers be held in every county; organize, and open books of subscription, every subscriber taking stock in bales of cotton to the extent of at least 25 per cent of their this year's crop; pledging themselves to reduce their next year's cotton crop to the extent in acres that will be required to produce the number of bales they subscribed.

Solicit loans from the banks to buy and carry over until next fall the amount of cotton subscribed, giving as collateral the cotton with a joint note of the county organization.

I believe that the banks of the South are willing and ready to aid the farficial to them and the country at large; and that they will furnish the money at so low rate of interest as they can afford. I cannot see where any danger of loss, either to the banks, or to the organization can be apprehended Certainly none to the banks, for if they can afford to loan the farmers money to risk making five cents cotThere's No Choice in Bicycles.
